The utility of a silicone perineal membrane for the management of painful and recurring vulvar lichen sclerosus. Vulvar lichen sclerosus (VLS) is a chronic pruritic inflammatory dermatosis of the vulva that has a strong predilection for postmenopausal women. Various therapies have been shown to be effective for the management of VLS. However, a significant number of patients continue to experience recurrent vulvar pain and/or irritation. We describe our experience with a patient who responded to a silicone perineal membrane. A 51-year-old woman presented with a history of vulvar itching and pain. She had been diagnosed with VLS 10 years prior to presentation and had received multiple topical and oral medications without improvement. Her skin had become thinner, and she was experiencing frequent vulvar ulcerations. Biopsy showed a thickened epidermis with increased melanin and an interface dermatitis with numerous eosinophils, consistent with chronic vulvar lichen sclerosus. Topical and oral treatment with a combination of a 5% hydrocortisone, 2.5% ketoconazole, and an antihistamine failed to alleviate her symptoms. A silicone perineal membrane was placed, and after 3 weeks, her vulvar ulcerations resolved completely. Four months after the placement of the silicone sheet, she was referred to a plastic surgeon because of persistence of the skin lesion. Repeat biopsy showed a lichenoid process. She has not had further complications and is currently under follow-up at a plastic surgery clinic.
